The following passage is from Far From the Madding Crowd, a Victorian novel describing events on a farm in rural England. In this scene Gabriel Oak attempts to protect the hayricks from being destroyed by an approaching storm.

A light flapped over the scene, as if reflected from phosphorescent wings crossing the sky, and a rumble filled the air. It was the first move of the approaching storm.

The second peal was noisy, with comparatively little visible lightning. Gabriel saw a candle shining in the bedroom of the farmhouse, and soon a shadow swept to and fro upon the blind.

Then there came a third flash. Manoeuvres of a most extraordinary kind were going on in the vast firmamental hollows overhead. The lightning now was the colour of silver, and gleamed in the heavens like a mailed army. Rumbles became rattles. Gabriel from his elevated position could see over the landscape at least half-a-dozen miles in front. Every hedge, bush, and tree was distinct as in a line engraving. In a paddock in the same direction was a herd of heifers, and the forms of these were visible at this moment in the act of galloping about in the wildest and maddest confusion, flinging their heels and tails high into the air, their heads to earth. A poplar in the immediate foreground was like an ink stroke on burnished tin. Then the picture vanished, leaving the darkness so intense that Gabriel worked entirely by feeling with his hands.

He had stuck his ricking-rod—a long iron lance—into the stack. A blue light appeared in the zenith, and in some indescribable manner flickered down near the top of the rod. It was the fourth of the larger flashes. A moment later and there was a smack—smart, clear, and short. Gabriel felt his position to be anything but a safe one, and he resolved to descend.

Not a drop of rain had fallen as yet. He wiped his weary brow, and looked again at the black forms of the unprotected stacks. Was his life so valuable to him after all? What were his prospects that he should be so chary of running risk, when important and urgent labour could not be carried on without such risk? He resolved to stick to the stack. Before Oak had laid his hands upon his tools again out leapt the fifth flash, with the spring of a serpent and the shout of a fiend. It was green as an emerald, and the reverberation was stunning.

The next flare came. There was then a silence everywhere for four or five minutes, and the crunch of the spars, as Gabriel hastily drove them in, could again be distinctly heard. He thought the crisis of the storm had passed. But there came a burst of light.

Heaven opened then, indeed. The flash was almost too novel for its inexpressibly dangerous nature to be at once realized, and he could only comprehend the magnificence of its beauty. It sprang from east, west, north, south, and was a perfect dance of death. The forms of skeletons appeared in the air, shaped with blue fire for bones—dancing, leaping, striding, racing around, and mingling altogether in unparalleled confusion. With these were intertwined undulating snakes of green, and behind these was a broad mass of lesser light. Simultaneously came from every part of the tumbling sky what may be called a shout; since, though no shout ever came near it, it was more of the nature of a shout than of anything else earthly. In the meantime one of the grisly forms had alighted upon the point of Gabriel's rod, to run invisibly down it, down the chain, and into the earth. Gabriel was almost blinded, and he could feel Bathsheba's warm arm tremble in his hand—a sensation novel and thrilling enough; but love, life, everything human, seemed small and trifling in such close juxtaposition with an infuriated universe.

NOTE
· Hayricks are large stacks of hay (dried grass used for feeding cattle during the winter).
· Heifers (paragraph 3) are young female cows.
· Spars (paragraph 6) are wooden poles.

The following poem was written in 2006 by Simon Armitage, who was recently appointed Oxford Professor of Poetry.

Horses, M62

Sprung from a field, of coachwork and chrome,
a team and are distant, gone,
of a dozen or so then a dunch
is suddenly here and amongst, and here alongside silhouettes is a horse,
in the butterscotch dusk. the writhing mat of its hide

One ghosts pressed on the glass—
between vans, a tank of worms—
traverses three lanes, a flank
its chess-piece head of actual horse ...
fording the river of fumes; It bolts,
one jumps the barricades all arse and tail

between carriageways; through a valley
a third slows of fleet saloons.
to a halt Regrouped they clatter away,

then bends, nosing then spooked by a horn
the road, tonguing the surface double back,
for salt. a riderless charge,

Standstill.
Motor oil pulses.
Black blood.

Some trucker
swings down from his cab under the sodium glow,
to muster and drove; but biblical, eastbound,
unbiddable, crossbred nags against the flow.
they scatter
through ginnels

NOTES
· The M62 is a motorway in the North of England.
· A "ginnel" is a narrow passage (usually between houses).
